Part 2: Reading

The banana plant grows in warm countries and bears a nourishing fruit popular throughout the world. The banana plant grows from 10 to 25 feet tall, and looks like a tree. But it is not a tree, because it has no woody trunk. It has what looks like a trunk, sometimes as much as 1-foot-thick at the bottom. This is made up of the long leafstalks of the plant which are wrapped tightly together in a long stiff bundle. When each new leaf appears at the top of the stalk, it is rolled tightly like a long green cigar. It unrolls as it grows, and finally comes to look like a great drooping feather, from 1 to 2 feet wide and from 6 to 10 feet long.

The banana plant grows to its full size 12 to 15 months. Then it sends out a huge cluster of flower buds at the end of strong, thick, curved stem which bends down toward the ground. A bract, which looks like a heavy purple petal, rolls back from the bud and shows a row of small flowers within. Some of these flowers turn into tiny green bananas. The banana plant dies after bearing one bunch of fruit. Growers start banana plants by replanting shoots produced by the roots of mature banana plants.

Generally, the only part of the banana plant that is used is the fruit, while the leaves and stalks are thrown away. But some kinds of banana plants produce a useful fiber. People use the leaves of certain kinds to roof houses or to make mats, bags and baskets.

The banana is one of the few fruits which can be bought fresh and in good condition at all times of the year. Its peeling is germproof and dirt proof. The fruits contain three valuable vitamins A, B and C.
