Local governments were our first governments. The primitive tribe that chose the strongest man to be its chief and the oldest men to form a council was establishing local government. It was seeking a better, safer life.

In the same way, the first English settlers who landed at Jamestown, Virginia, in 1607 soon realized that they needed rules and leaders. At first, the settlers searched for gold, and had to find their own food and provide their own shelter. As food supplies began to run low, and as the colonists faced hunger and disease, they saw that they needed to work together if the colony wants to survive. The colonists formed a council to make laws for the colony. They chose Captain John Smith as president of the council to see that the laws were carried out. This government at Jamestown was the first local government in America.

Today, local government is still the first and most important government in our lives. It protects our lives, our safety, and our homes, and it helps to keep our environment clean. Local government provides us with schools, libraries, and other important services.

The forces of erosion eventually act upon even the most deeply buried igneous rocks. When this occurs, the rock will crumble and decompose under the influence of chemical and mechanical weathering, and particles will be dissolved in water or washed away by streams, blown by winds, or carried away by glaciers.

Water is the most active factor in transporting sediment, as this weathered material is called, for rivers and streams continually shape the landscape and carry the sediment either as particles or in solution. Such material may settle out of the water because of its weight, or it may be precipitated chemically from a dissolved state.

When this sediment becomes lithified into solid rock, it is termed sedimentary rock. When sand particles solidify, for instance, they become sandstone; gravel becomes conglomerate; clay or mud becomes shale. Rock salt and beds of borax are also sedimentary rocks.
